Union officials adopted a defiant attitude to-day and sent a swarm of pickets to persuade workers who might be inclined to accept the manufacturers' offer not to return. The police watched the cloak and suit shops to prevent any repetition of fights between strikebreakers and strikers' pickets, such as led to hundreds of arrests during the strike of 1910. Morris Hillquit, general counsel for the International Ladies Garment Workers of America, declared "not 1,000 of 50,000 strikers will go back."
